The Story of the Pumpkin That Wouldn't Grow Big

By Alice E. Morgan

Once upon a time there were two little pumpkins. About the size of tennis balls, they nestled under the leaves of the mother plant and did very little all day. One day they began talking about the future and what they would become.

"I'm going to grow into a nice big pumpkin and turn into a pie," the one little pumpkin said.

"Not me," said the other. "I'm going to just sit for a while longer, and then when I do start to grow, I'm not going to eat very much. I want to be a little pumpkin."

The first pumpkin thought that was very silly, and said so. He began to get every bit of food he could find and eagerly drank every drop of rain water he could get. He grew and grew and grew, and before long his fat little sides were so round he could not hide under the leaves any longer.

He made fun of the little pumpkin, which could still hide under just one leaf, but he didn't eat any more, he didn't drink any more, and he grew very, very slowly.

Swells With Pride
This went on all summer. The bigger the one pumpkin grew, the more fun he made of the little pumpkin. Pretty soon the farmer and his wife began stopping at the vine in the corn field to admire the big pumpkin. "That'll sure make a lot of pies, wife," the farmer said one day, and the big pumpkin swelled with pride.

"See, Smarty," he jeered at the little pumpkin. "See, they stop to look at me, but they never look at you."

"I don't care," said the little pumpkin. "I've got plans."

"Plans, humph!" sneered the big pumpkin, and began getting more food.

The corn grew tall and made more shade, and the two pumpkins went on as they were—one growing so very fast, and the other hardly at all. Soon the farmer and his wife began coming to the garden every day to gather the juicy ears of corn, and every day they admired the big pumpkin. The corn stopped growing, the leaves began to wither, and there was a nip in the air.

Both pumpkins began to notice little spots on them changing color, and knew that before long their skins would be a rich yellow.

The little pumpkin wriggled some more, and made the curve in his stem a bit better.

At last! One morning there was frost, and the farmer came, with a sharp knife and cut them both from the vine. The big pumpkin was carried into the house, and in just a few days he was on his way to turn into pies.

This part wasn't so good. The farmer's wife cut him into pieces with a big knife and put them on the stove to cook. It grew hotter and hotter there, while the little pumpkin sat on the back porch, where it was cool.

At last the boiling was over, but then the poor pumpkin was pushed with a big round stick, and finally shoved rudely through a lot of fine wires. He had to stand any number of strong spices, some goosy molasses and finally, that terrible heat again when the housewife put him in the oven to bake.

All the time the little pumpkin sat on the porch. One day two small hands reached for him. He was hustled into a car, and went for a long ride, until, just at dusk they came to Birmingham.

A man with strong hands and a sharp knife, cut a hole around the stem, lifted that off, scraped out the seeds, and before you knew it, the little pumpkin had a wide grinning mouth, two three-cornered eyes, and all things—a lighted flash, the light shining through them. All evening he sat on a small table near the window while a little boy and girl danced wildly around him, laughing at the grinning, mouth and thanking their daddy so much for making him.

The next night, just at dark, he was whisked into the car again, only this time the little boy and girl were all dressed up. The little boy was a great big rabbit, and the little girl was a pretty blue flower!

So Wonderful
When the car stopped this time, the flashlight was turned on again, and everywhere the little pumpkin looked there were children, all dressed up in crazy costumes. They laughed and jostled each other, and suddenly, off in the distance, some soft music sounded. The children grabbed up their pumpkin and began to march.

Down streets lined with laughing mothers and dolls and friends they went, and on to the school grounds. Over to a big tree where the children all had something to eat and drink, and finally, into a big building where—the pumpkin's heart skipped a beat—there were movies. Dogs, cats, rabbits, horses, cows and even pigs that talked just like people.

Even a little mouse talked and danced, and a duck cooked meals! The little pumpkin could hardly stand it, it was all so wonderful. When the movies stopped, and the children were again bundled into the car, the little girl turned in flashlight out. In the little pumpkin smiled sleepily to himself and said, "Well, I sure hope the big pumpkin has as much fun in a pie as I did at the Birmingham Halloween party!"
