Proper Meat Care Is Important in Having Good Meals

Since meat is a major item in food buying, the importance of its proper care in the kitchen cannot be overemphasized, particularly for homemakers who habitually slip their meat packages in the refrigerator straight from their shopping bag.

Paper wrappings from around fresh meat should be removed first. The meat should then be placed on a plate or in a shallow pan.

It is left uncovered or covered lightly with wax paper to allow for a little drying, which is desirable in keeping fresh meat. It then needs to be placed immediately in the meat compartment or in the coldest part of the refrigerator.

A cold, dry location, but not necessarily the coldest part of the refrigerator, is best for smoked meats such as ham or bacon.

Add when cooking bacon, homemakers should take out of the refrigerator only the amount they'll be using, since room temperatures do not keep bacon at its best.

Cooked meats and leftovers, she says, should be stored in the refrigerator tightly covered. The covering is needed to help keep the meat from drying out.

Frozen meat should be placed in the refrigerator until time to defrost it for cooking.

It's Not So Hard To Cook for a Twosome; Try This:

What to do when cooking for two? With a wide selection of meat, homemakers can easily plan interesting menus without fear of meatline monotony. Homemakers might choose a small pork loin for two meals. When purchasing the roast, the chine bone from the rib side. With this bone loosened, chops for the first meal can be easily cut from one end, the remaining meat can make a fine roast for the next day's dinner. Another good buy is the arm bone pot-roast. Cubes are cut from the shank end and in a colorful summer stew. For the next two meals, the meat is divided half with the center cut for braising as a pot-roast and the other half for Swiss steaks. For a small family, a further suggestion is a smoked shoulder butt. After simmering, the smoked meat can be covered with a glaze and finished cooking in the oven. For the meal to follow, the meat can be served sliced, broiled with prepared mustard and broiled.
