"We're not quitting until this job is done"

Operation Underground

It was about 10 A. M. on a dull, grey morning when the huge steam shovel accidentally hooked onto an underground telephone cable.
Tom, a Michigan Bell splicer, and Ed, his helper, were among the telephone men who arrived on the scene within minutes. The situation was bad. Out of 200 pairs of vital telephone wires inside the cable, 135 were broken. And, to make matters worse, a steady rain had started, threatening to flood the hole where the break occurred.
The first job was to make temporary repairs on the most important wires so that calls could go through. Working swiftly, Tom and Ed completed their part of this job by 2 P. M.
But then more trouble developed. Water from a nearby open-type drain began spilling into the hole where the men were working. If the open cable were submerged, moisture would short circuit the wires.
Pumps were working furiously. Meanwhile, Tom and Ed began building a foundation of planking. Then, with another plank as a lever, they began prying up the cable to keep it above the water level.
Higher and higher the water rose . . . above their knees . . . up to their waists and beyond. By sheer exertion, they kept lifting the cable break up and up. Sometimes it was only an inch and a half above the rising water. But more pumps were put to work and finally the water began to go down.
The problem now was to restore service on the remaining wires in the cable. This meant putting in a new section of cable ten feet long and making 400 wire splices at each end of the new piece.
Several times the foreman asked Tom and Ed if they didn't want to be relieved by another splicing crew. But they replied, "Look, this is an important cable. We don't want to quit until the job's done." The foreman agreed.
And that's how the precious threads of communication were restored between the outside world and the vital B-24 Bomber Plant at Willow Run, during the war.
This is one of countless stories that show the determination of Michigan Bell workers to keep your telephone calls going through.
