TRAFFIC DEATHS

A favorable change in Michigan's traffic death rate is reported by Commissioner Donald S. Leonard in a year-end resume of State Police activities. The steady upward rise in highway fatalities which began in August, 1948, was reversed in November, when the death toll, of 198 reported, showed a reduction of 16 per cent, or 27 under the same month of 1948. Although half per cent of December will reflect the same trend.

There were 3,650 persons injured in November, an increase of 100, of three per cent, over November, 1948. Reported accidents totaled 12,818, a gain of 922, or eight per cent.

As it stands, a net decrease of four per cent in traffic deaths is expected for the year, Leonard said. In 1948 there were 1,512 killed against an estimated 1,450 in 1949. On the other hand, there were a net gain of 1,450 increase in both accidents and injuries.

Accidents in 1948 totaled 140,172, while the estimate for 1949 is 142,250. Injuries increased from 40,992 to 41,600. Traffic deaths, however, was much heavier.

The death rate per 100 million miles travel dropped from 19.9 persons to 17.2, or nine per cent, in 1948 drivers in Michigan traveling 19,119,400,000 miles, while in 1949 the total is estimated at 20 billion, a gain of 100 million miles.

Traffic arrests made by State Police increased 19 per cent, or 42,561 to 60,482. Roadside assistance was given to 32,208 motorists.

TRAFFIC DEATHS

Later a similar sex murder in Lansing and additional offenses in the Detroit area led to the establishment of the Governor's study commission and appropriations by the "little legislature" to provide mental facilities for the care of pilot deviate and create a department and state police schools, both of which had been discontinued after 1941 because of the war. The state school is sponsored by the State Police in conjunction with the Michigan associations of sheriffs and police chiefs.
