Steeplejack Leo Dooley of Detroit gets a bird's eye view of Birmingham as he repairs the First Methodist church steeple. The weather vane was removed and the steeple re-capped after suffering damage from a bolt of lightning early in September.

Dooley worked amid breezes and irate wasps to complete his work.

The sound system of the church, damaged also during the storm, was repaired while the work was being done on the steeple. (Dick Shirk Photo)

HORSE SENSE AND NONSENSE

FALL MEMORIES

This time of year always makes me homesick—homesick for the fall days, spent in a little rural school.

It brings back memories of that mile-long walk home every afternoon, with the soft, hazy October sun on my back. My memory hears the soft thud of falling fruit and nuts and the brilliant flame of the changing leaves.

It recalls the hum of the corn cutters as the farmers filled their silos. The softening shouting of the drivers to their teams and the muted rumble of the big iron wheels across the hard ground.

It brings back pictures of the long Saturday afternoon walks in search of hickories and hickory nuts. Of the trips to the stone quarry where the wild grapes were plentiful and so sweet and juicy.

THERE WERE hunts for squirrel tails, with the thrill of finding a vast store of beechnuts stored away for the long winter months.

It was the time of year when the whistle of the woodchuck seemed louder and more piercing than any other. Around every farm was the chatter of birds as they flocked for the trip south.

After school the kids ganged together and raked sugar maple leaves to be burned after dark. This became the focal point for all nearby families and the evening was spent singing and talking around the huge fire.

Of course the highlight of the affair was when some one of the kids took a rake and scattered the embryos of corn and potatoes, corn and onions, buried there to rot. A restaurateur in the world can produce fare like that!

LIVING in a rural area has its own thrills for the fall, too. There were after-school hours spent picking and sorting apples, with a promise of a trip to the cider mill as a reward.

Cider is nothing always good, but when you hold a wooden mug under the press spout, a mug that has been seasoned by years of soaking in cider, then you have a drink!

Rural communities, too, live closer to the soil than cities. From it they get not only their daily bread, but the means of purchasing the comforts of their lives.

The beginning of the harvest means the beginning of a steady stream of suppers. Churches give them, schools give them, clubs give them. In a really enterprising community you can eat out just about every night in the week.

SOME GROUPS had their specialties, back in the old days. At the Presbyterian church it was always baked ham, cabbage salad, pumpkin pies and home made ice cream for the "features."

The Methodists and the Eastern Stars went in for chicken and biscuits. The Catholics specialized in roast turkey and the Baptists in roast beef.

You could smell that supper cooking long before you reached the church. You poked dad along as fast as you could (and he seemed to eternal sleep) and tried to get there in time to dash out in the kitchen to say your little prayer. That never-days meant a square of gingerbread or a hot muffin to tide you over.

THOSE TABLES practically sagged—and could sag in the kitchen one group of mothers scurried around heaping plates while others treated their kitchen to dining room with them.

When you finally reached the bustling point they were made away and you were faced with huge plates of dessert. Somehow you always found a way. Somehow, too, going home dad was always in a dudge of a hurry!

You trotted along, the sun, too full to breathe, and the air that blew against your face made you hunch all over. It was laden with the smells of jams, jellies, pickles and preserved fruits.

Lamp light glowed softly from the homes and the fallen leaves rustled under your feet. A clear moon rode high in the sky, giving promise of nice day tomorrow and life was good.

IT'S THE WAVING LOTION that makes all the difference!

Richard Hudnut Home Permanent
Tests made by a nationally known independent research laboratory* show that hair is measurably springier and stronger (less apt to break) after waving with 22% more effective Richard Hudnut Creme Waving Lotion . . . than after waving with other home permanent waving lotions.
It's the extra penetration plus the gentler conditioning action of the Richard Hudnut Creme Waving Lotion that gives your hair the wave you wish you were born with . . . stronger, springier, with greater natural sheen.
This wonderful waving lotion is pleasantly fragranced, too!
