Company Praises Work of Wives' Promoting Safety

Unofficial "employees" are constantly boosting the safety record of the Michigan Bell company, according to Walter B. Fausser, Birmingham manager.

Fausser said that plant department officials all over the state report that wives are among the greatest promoters of safety that the company has. They have talked their husbands into being careful on the job and are efficient workers in the fight against industrial accidents.

In recent safety meeting wives of employees have been invited to voice their ideas about the man of the house exercising caution while on the job.

Fausser said "The most important members of our safety team are these same wives, who, working about possible accidents to husbands have talked safety so much at home that the man of the house has begun to think safety on the job."

and more meetings are held, the wives are going to have even greater opportunity to promote the idea of hubby coming home all in one piece.

He pointed to further evidence of the company's belief that wives and safety meetings mix well in the presence of John A. Greene, Bell president, and Waldorf T. Kirk, general plant manager. They don't ask wives to "say a word," but let them talk on and on.

Fausser said company officials and plant managers felt the Michigan Bell accident record of one and one-half lost-time accidents.
