Plan Series to Show Dangers to Children

An extensive educational program designed to warn children of the hazards of playing around partly finished homes is to result from the Sept. 6 meeting of city officials, builders, the YMCA and civic leaders.
 The meeting, called primarily to find a solution to the property destruction in partly completed buildings in Birmingham, ended in a popular opinion that greater education in the hazards around these unfinished buildings was needed.

 Police and firemen, reporting on the numerous calls they have received, cited cases in which serious injury and possible death could have come to the children involved.

Fire Chief V. W. Griffith reaffirmed the statement he made a few weeks ago regarding the first in a new home on Glenhurst, saying he cannot see how the child responsible for the fire escaped from the building.
 Chief Ralph V. Moxley, speaking for the police, said his department received many calls from persons who saw children playing around construction sites and warned of the danger involved.

uses in a case like that." During the next several weeks The Eclectic will carry a series of illustrated articles highlighting the things which builders and engineers feel to be the most dangerous to children.
 For the sake of the lives of area children the committee asks wholehearted cooperation of parents, saying that in addition, a campaign for "better housekeeping" in keeping danger points more closely guarded would be carried on by area builders.

NAMING ED KIRBERT, YMCA executive secretary, chairman of a committee of three, those present at the meeting asked that plans be made to publicize the dangers of piggybacking children to and from construction sites and asked the cooperation of parents in this planned protection.

Working with Kirbert on the plans are B. G. Ozans city building inspector and Robert Nelson, representing area builders.
 In a meeting Monday the committee laid plans for their program which will point up the principal hazards children face while at the location of a new building. They plan to show the dangers of the practice from the very start through to the completion of the building.

"True, the children are damaging some of the buildings going up here," Nelson said, "but the risk to the child is far greater. Another building can be built but it cannot be restored to a dead child, nor sound limbs to a crippled one."

HE MENTIONED several accidents and deaths which have been recorded in surrounding communities which happened as children satisfied their natural curiosity and "went to see what it was all about."
 In Detroit this year a small child died in a ditch cave-in. "The foreman wasn't away from the job more than a couple of hours," Nelson said. "It is not a case of the work being without anyone around. A small child can slip into a ditch and start the dirt sliding. It's only a matter of minutes."
