St. Dunstan's Performance Of 'Yellow Jack' Reviewed

By BILL KEGEL

Man's struggle, through medicine, to overcome the ravages of yellow fever supplies the theme for "Yellow Jack" which is being presented by St. Dunstan's Guild. Members and guests at the Cranbrook Pavilion last Friday and Saturday, February 15th and 16th were treated to a spirited performance of the play which the late Sidney Howard wrote in collaboration with Paul de Kruif.

Although one does not usually think of medical history providing a basis for drama in the theater, the present production holds the interest throughout. This is due partly to the play itself, but largely to the sincere performances given by the cast which is composed of members of St. Dunstan's.

It is the sincerity which the amateur brings to the role which often causes the audience to get more enjoyment from the play than they might have gained from a professional production.

THE ACTION of "Yellow Jack" opens in a London laboratory in 1923 where experiments are being conducted to perfect a serum to combat yellow fever. There follows a flashback to 1927 in West Africa where the West Africa Yellow Fever Commission of the Rockefeller Foundation is working out the method of infecting live monkeys as a means of studying the disease.

This leads us to a further flashback to 1900 in Cuba, where Walter Reed and his associates proved conclusively that yellow fever was carried by the ordinary household mosquito.

It is here that the principal portion of the play takes place. We move graphically from the early days when there was only a suspicion that the mosquito was spreading the disease, on to the experiments by the doctors on themselves, and finally to the infecting of certain soldiers who have volunteered for sundry reasons to further the interests of science.

Conflict is provided by the divergence of ideas among the characters involved and interest is sustained by the sheer drama of the documentary.

JERRY McMECHAN has done a masterful job of directing the play and he also appears to good advantage in the part of one of Walter Reed's associates whose dire contributed much towards the progress of the experiments.

Settings have been effectively designed by Harry Booth, and the lighting which was coordinated by James Schneider and Paul Averill adds much to the production.

Walter Reed and his crew make the twenty-seven scenes change with a great deal of precision which is a great deal of credit towards keeping the play moving at all times.

It would be difficult as well as unfair to single out any one performance because everyone involved acquires himself with credit. It is fitting, however, that those who had longer and more difficult roles to master should be given special recognition, and among these are Tems Licklider, Weston Meyer, John Rice, Bill Sanders, Otis Thompson, Ed Reid, Tim King, Bud Adams, Bob Woodruff, Dwight Engert, and Lewis Keenan.

ADDITIONAL performances will be given this Friday and Saturday, February 22nd and 23rd.
