FOR OUTDOOR FILM FANS
Let's get on with our lesson in outdoor photography—or how to increase your batting average in those snapshots. Just to refresh your memory we mentioned the importance of natural action rather than posed shots in last week's column. And we pointed out the essentials of good lighting when using color film.

Now let's tackle a big word—"composition." How does it apply in outdoor photography? It concerns the light and shadow balance in your picture, and the artistic symmetry, or framing. For instance you may be taking a picture of a fisherman casting from a rowboat. How can you "compose" your setting to make it most effective?

Watch the Background
The background or horizon is very important. Unless it's a silhouette shot an all-sky background is too monotonous. Find a bit of the shoreline with pretty trees growing in an irregular pattern. "Frame" your fisherman in the viewfinder so that his head and shoulders may be outlined against the sky while the rest of the body contrasts against the trees or distant shore. Then release the shutter at a moment that captures the feeling you get from the scene. If it's action you want you must get the angler in the process of casting or battling a fish. If it's the peaceful serenity of a lovely lake that impresses you, snap your fisherman while he's lazily reclining on a boat seat.

Foreground Atmosphere
To give depth to your picture it's often a good idea to frame part of it through a leafy bower, or over the shoulder of someone close to the camera. Don't let this foreground material dominate. It should merely give atmosphere and depth contrast. Professional photographers who go for those "alone" shots often use archways in the foreground to point up some distant scene. You can do the same thing in effect, shooting over the stern of a speeding boat to get the pattern of a swirling wake, climbing a hill and using the corner of a jagged rock in the foreground to shoot your companion in the distance waving, while the trees meet overhead to form a natural arch in the foreground.

Shots like this are memorable keepakes of wonderful trips, and while they often take a little more time in planning and preparation they're more than worth it in recapturing fun of another vacation in Michigan Outdoors.

★ Smile a Minute . . .
One big reason why so many human beings cannot stand prosperity is that they never get a chance to. (This does not mean that, in many cases, the opportunity isn't available—it's simply never seen by 'em.)
