

Nat'l Magazine Praises Design of High School

The Birmingham high school has been singled out for its excellent design in the July issue of "Progressive Architecture," national architectural magazine. The ten pages of pictures and text devoted to this Michigan School are part of an editorial feature on contemporary American school design.

In this issue, the editors go directly to the client—the principals, the teachers, the students, the custodians—for their reactions concerning the architectural merit of their school.

Ross A. Wagner, principal of the high school, applauds the school for its efficient design and its attractive environment. He describes it as "more conducive to pleasant school experiences than that of most schools," and adds that it is "a building that has achieved beauty and function without expenditure of unnecessary sums of money."

The present building group has a capacity of 1200, and when plans are completed will be able to accommodate a maximum of 1800 pupils.

The architects are also lauded for their resourceful structural design and selection of materials.

THE TEACHERS praise the roomy and light classroom, which offer adequate and adaptable work space. Ten past and present officers of student council particularly commend the building for its simplicity and the designer's use of color.

Also student-acclaimed are soundproofing, lighting and furniture. The rooms are called "easy to study in." The custodian states that the school is easy to heat and clean, and that the wiring has given little trouble.

The designers, Swanson Associates of Bloomfield Hills, Michigan, have achieved an excellent example of school-building design allowing economical future expansion, the article states.

THE LAND on which the building stands was purchased in the 1890s, and is fast becoming the center of rapidly-growing Birmingham's student population. As the editors point out, this factor created the need for an expandable
