Nature Can Afford to Be Lavish with Time

By LYDIA KING FREHSE Special Writer for The Birmingham Eccentric

With the coming of winter we are all caught up in time's relentless hand, there is a face the passing of the old and the coming of the New Year.

But it is he who pursues the study of natural sciences who comes early on to an acute awareness of time's immensity and its bearing on life.

Of these it is the astronomer, the geologist and the paleontologist who deal most surely with the great reaches of time.

THE PALEONTOLOGIST can retell the story of past life on earth... One such of his profession is...

NO ONE KNOWS how long our particular universe was in the making, but astronomers estimate its age at five billion years.

And if this is the age of our earth, how long has it sustained life? Again the uranium clock, plus the fossil record, comes to man's aid.

And if this is the age of our earth, how long has it sustained life? Again the uranium clock, plus the fossil record, comes to man's aid.

IT IS LESS than a hundred years (1859) since Charles Darwin published his monumental work "The Origin of the Species."

AGAIN THE figures are relative and ever-changing, and no man can point his finger to a day when human consciousness dawned.

LET ME NOTE the analogy of the astronomer Sir James Jeans, "the height of the Woolworth building represent geologic time."
