HOME BUILDING GROWTH in the Birmingham-Bloomfield and the lake areas to the west in the past four years has been somewhat near phenomenal as the above maps graphically prove. The two maps, surprisingly enough, were printed just four years apart. The map at the right was released in 1950 while the map on the left is reported as the latest subdivision map available. While growth north of Birmingham in Bloomfield Hills and Troy has progressed rapidly since 1950, subdivision development about the area's country clubs and lakes to the west of the city has been unbelievable. The arrows indicate centers of the greatest building activity in the past four years. While city residents are impressed by the ever-changing scenery in the areas about Birmingham, few realize that the city itself has gained a third of its population within the short four year span as the north Woodward suburban trek continues. Few also believe that the building and real estate business in this area has grown to a multi-million dollar program. Its effects on city, school and township services have brought an accompanying change in the district's politics as the last vestiges of farm life passes from the scene. The maps were prepared by Snyder, Kinney and Bennett, Inc., Birmingham realtors.
