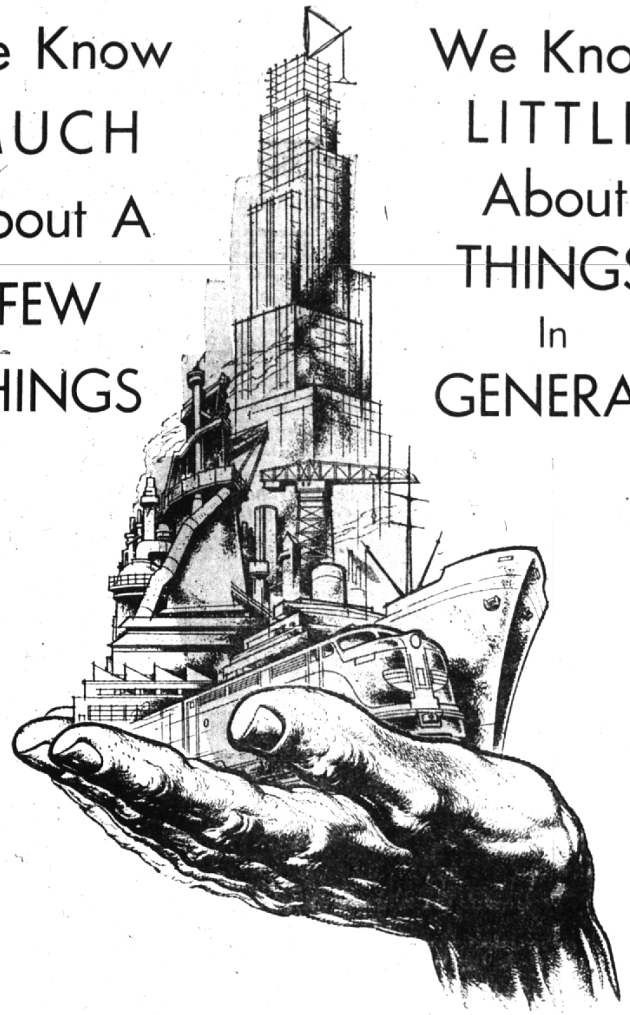
The Price Of PROGRESS

We Know MUCH About A FEW THINGS



We Know LITTLE About THINGS In GENERAL

Gone are the days when a visit to the barber shop sufficed to learn all about the social activities of the community. Gone too, are the days when attendance at the town meeting resolved most civic affairs. Specialization has isolated all of us in two ways. It has drawn all our talents and interests into narrow spheres and created such a complicated mass of civic and social life we cannot possibly act intelligently in any field outside our own unless we get the information somehow. That is why it is mandatory that each and every one of us thoroughly read the newspapers that inform us of these matters. For this information permits us to act intelligently on matters we cannot possibly know from first hand contact.
