

COMMUTER'S WIFE

One-Friend Women Face Lonely Days

By HELEN BRUNSON
Special Writer for The Birmingham Eccentric

Have you ever seen a couple of married women who have become so overly friendly that one can't have a thought that the other doesn't share.

Every once in a while one of these over-friendships develops and you wonder how they got that way and how long it will last. Of course such a relationship has its advantages. These two can help each other with baby-sitting, let one-another in on where the best bargains in town can be had and share information on which doctors to go to (all details included). They can even advise each other on marital problems. They always have someone to attend women's club meetings with, go shopping or on a picnic at the lake while their men are at work.

THERE MAY BE other advantages but to one outside, they would seem to be few, and the disadvantages loom pretty big. One of them is that other friends of both seem to think that she has the time and attention of the other, and "Gloria as each one loses some of her individuality in the process. Knowing that the two are inseparable, spend as much time as possible together, and sharp practicality all their information, outside feel that whenever they do a favor for one, or invite her somewhere, they must also do so for the other. This results in a few lost invitations for both Susan and Gloria, though they may not know of care, since they, after all, have each other. ANOTHER drawback to two women becoming soul-mates like this is in our extremely mobile population, one or the other is likely to move away, thus leaving the other high and dry. For, in the years that they have cultivated each other so intensively, they naturally have neglected to pay attention to other women enough to make many other good friendships. And other women, seeing the leech-like qualities of these two, may hesitate to be too friendly with the one left in town — lest they be next to enter into an almost strangling relationship. There is the possibility of one husband becoming a little too interested in the other wife, remote though it is. More likely that he sees so much of her that he gets fed up with her.

EACH GIRL comes to believe that she has the time and attention of the other, and "Gloria as each one loses some of her individuality in the process. Knowing that the two are inseparable, spend as much time as possible together, and sharp practicality all their information, outside feel that whenever they do a favor for one, or invite her somewhere, they must also do so for the other.
