Safety Campaign Points Up Dangers Of Blasting Caps

Dangers of blasting caps in the inexperienced hands of boys and girls will be the subject of a safety drive this week, it was announced by Birmingham Police Chief Ralph W. Moxley.

Posters, showing four different types of caps and in big red letters a warning to children, "Don't Touch Blasting Caps," will be distributed with other safety material as Chief Moxley begins his annual drive to alert people to the dangers of handling these dangerous tools.

Great expansion in road building, quarrying, construction and other essential American industries has materially increased the demand for commercial explosives, Chief Moxley said. And where dynamite is used, whether it be for clearing fields of stumps or digging foundations for a skyscraper, blasting caps are also needed.

THE CAPS are tubes of aluminum or copper, a little smaller around than an ordinary pencil and from one to five-and-one-half inches long.

The caps in themselves are dangerous since they contain a powder charge that can be set off by careless handling, shock or heat. When they explode, bits of metal fly in all directions. These fragments can tear off a child's finger or blind him for life, Moxley emphasized.
