Guidance Clinic to Help Solve Family Problems

By RUTH ANN SILBAR

What does a child guidance clinic do? How does it operate and how badly needed are its services in a community? Exploring these needs, the Birmingham Junior League now is working to establish a branch of the Oakland Child Guidance Clinic in Birmingham. It is hoped it will be in operation by the first of the year.

A child guidance clinic, League members point out, is a psychiatric service that helps children and parents work out disturbances and difficulties which frequently arise in childhood. A clinic serves children from infancy through high school age.

In Arthur's case, the clinic helped the boy to understand his own feelings and to have faith in his own ability. In consultation with Arthur's parents, they were helped to recognize Arthur's good points and reduce competition with his sister.

THE BRANCH CLINIC to be established in Birmingham, under the sponsorship of the Junior League, follows the direction and in cooperation with the Oakland Child Guidance Clinic, Miss Olive Viola will supervise the branch here, but full professional services of the mother clinic will be available when needed.

Child guidance clinics in Michigan are under administration of the Michigan Department of Mental Health and first began 15 years ago. There are now 17 clinics in operation throughout the state, financed jointly by the state and community effort.

Since demands for services are great in all of these clinics, Michigan's goal for the future is 20 clinics with expansion of services of the 17 already established. Each clinic or branch works closely with various social agencies in the community.

TO UNDERSTAND the reasons for a child's difficulty, or the parents' problems in relation to the child, the clinic worker, psychologist, psychiatrist, working as a team, make a thorough study of the child's behavior, his adjustment at home and in school, his earlier life experience and his physical health.

By talking over the problem, parents and child are able to understand the reasons for the ment of Mental Health and in cooperation with the Oakland Child Guidance Clinic.
