

HERE'S A SWITCH on Mary and the lamb she brought to school. Sandra Pegg, of Troy, brought her horse, Tony, to Poppleton school for a pet show sponsored by the Troy summer playground program. Here Sandra and her palomino stand atop the steps of the old Troy schoolhouse adjoining their playground. Under the direction of Poppleton playground supervisor Shirley Schroeder and Troy playground director Sam Tassio, children displayed their cats, dogs, turtles, and even a pair of burros. Prize-winners received T shirts.

Says the Barrister

You stand ready to pay for that occasional broken window or ruined rose bush done by your little ones. But what about those acts of vandalism done to homes and schools that we read about so often. Homes and summer cottages, too. Sometimes the damages run into thousands of dollars. I was wondering if in Michigan we had a law that makes the parents pay for the damages caused by their children. I found out that generally the law in United States follows the old common law rule that for wrongs done of property of another—torts as the law calls them—only the child was responsible. The owner could not make the parents pay. As a partial protection to the public and to the owner of private property, the Michigan legislature by public act 45 of the 1953 session placed a burden on the parents of children who have committed acts of vandalism. Now the mothers and fathers of children guilty of malicious destruction of property may be held liable for damages up to $500.
