THE RICHARD A. Freund family gets a sneak preview of one of the main attractions of Walnut Lake Fair to be held at 1 p.m. Saturday, June 9. Since "daddy" is general chairman of the fair... "mommie" and the "kiddies" approve of his choice in obtaining ponies available for rides from the Ivory Polo grounds. Waiting their turn for a ride are (from left) Robert, Meredith, Francis and Patricia—in the saddle, other attractions are a carousel, pick-pocket lady; and the full length movie of Treasure Island. Free rides on the Snow Crop train for the kiddies may be obtained by turning in labels from their frozen fruits and vegetables.

It's a Battle of Brains for Farmer and Fox

ANN ARBOR—What's in Reynard's bag of tricks?

"Plenty besides an occasional barnyard hen," says George Hunt, instructor in wildlife management at the University of Michigan.

"Many are the wiles the Michigan red fox uses to mislead the dogs the farmer sets yelping at his heels.

"One of his tricks is to run in a circle, probably so as not to get too far from home. If there are young in the den, father fox will lead the hounds far away. Often he retraces his own steps for a few yards and then makes a long sidewise jump. The dogs, having gone on to the end of the trail, try in vain to get the scent from that point," Hunt says.

"AGAIN," he continues, "Reynard will walk along the top rail of fences or the dry ridges where his scent will not remain. Or he will go round and round in the midst of a herd of cattle or sheep so his scent is hidden. He will even cross streams on logs.

"He often outwits even that inveterate trapsetter—man. To accomplish this he will scratch underneath the steel contraption, turn it over and then spring it so that it is harmless against him."

Hunt points out that although the farmer and the fox are such unrelenting enemies, they actually manage to benefit each other in a great many ways—quite unintentionally, of course.

"THE FOX destroys numberless field mice and woodchucks for the farmer. In return, the farmer supplies hens for our poultry-raising friends. We might even say that the fox is grateful for those convenient bridges the farmer has made for his as finicky as a cat a year, have been taken in about getting wet feet.

"And he probably laughs wistfully at seeing how the farmer has cleared the land of wolves and panthers," Hunt says.

Although occasionally a fox will raid a hen-roost if he can force entrance, it seems it's quite unfair to consider him a hopeless murderer.

Hunt declares that, as with man, it's the individual who is the outlaw. "It's unfair to blame the species," he emphasizes.

HUNT SAYS that in the past several years an estimated average of 20,000 to 25,000 red foxes have been taken in Michigan.

"In spite of the bounty placed on their hides their number has increased," he says.

"But the pelts, which were once prized by furriers for their beauty are no longer in the fashion show entrance, it seems it's quite unfair to consider him a hopeless murderer, muskrat and otter."
