doeskin
flannel:
fabric gem

Not all gems come out of jewelry cases. Some—like Doeskin Hairline Flannel—are woven. There have been stripes in fabrics ever since some obscure weaver juggled his warp or woof at regular intervals—but Lebow's mini-stripes, with subtle gradations of balanced tones, are something else again; subdued, neat, and important-looking.

Doeskin Flannel is one-suit magic. It looks as well on the way home as it does at 9:30 A.M. It works, goes out in the evening, travels, and stays impressive. How? No secret—just a great fabric origination, effectively tailored. This is the fine flannel suit you need this Spring—in the new light color tones. The suit,

BALLAD

Oh my mother came from Ireland,
And my father's father, too,
And the songs of a thousand storied years
Throng at my lips, striving through.

Oh my heart has the shape of a shamrock,
And a banhee wall stills its beat,
But the pulse is stamped by the merry tramp
Of the Kerry-dancers' feet.

Oh the "little bit of Heaven"
Is a fey strain in my blood,
For the River Shannon flows through my veins
And bears me along on its flood.

The Little Crayturs invite me
With green-gloved beckoning taunts,
And I steal from my bed to join in the rites
Of their mystic midnight jaunts.

There's a surge of a melancholy
Dirge that seeks reason
For my fabled sire who mottled the green
With a dedicated stain.

Oh I'm signed with the cross of St. Patrick,
And marked by a Leprechaun,
And warrior and peasant and Brian Boru
Mingle in strange liaison;

For my mother came from Ireland,
And all she brought was a harp,
But the echoing throb of the song it sang
Still stirs the strings of my heart.
