C. A. Chayne Named to MIT Governing Body

Charles A. Chayne, General Motors vice president in charge of engineering, has been elected to a period from November 15 through April 15, by using the new dormant spray method (thereby avoiding the periods of heavy spring and fall bird migration as well as of nesting).

4) Use only mist blower equipment and not hydraulic spray equipment, to minimize dripping that contaminates pools and puddles where birds drink and bathe.

5) STRESS SANITATION. Remove dying elms immediately. When weather is too cold for spraying assign more men to remove dead and dying wood from elms.

6) Make sure that the State Department of Agriculture law is enforced which states that dead and dying elms must be removed within ten days.

7) Enact a city ordinance prohibiting private operators from spraying trees with DDT or other sprays destructive to bird life between April 15 and November 15.

Chayne was graduated from MIT in 1919. A year later he joined the faculty and was an instructor in mechanical engineering until 1926. He joined GM's Buick Division in 1930 and became chief engineer of Buick in 1936. He has been GM vice president in charge of engineering staff since 1951.

City Is Aware Of DDT Hazards To Bird Life

Birmingham is following six of the seven steps outlined by the Detroit Audubon society to eliminate hazards to bird life from DDT spraying. City Forester Charles Gale reported this week.

The seventh suggestion—to have a city ordinance prohibiting private contractors from spraying during six warm months—is considered too complicated to adopt without intensive study, Gale recommended.

"We believe Birmingham's control program (for Dutch elm disease spraying) is a sound balance of protection for both our elm trees and our birds," Gale said.

THE AUDUBON suggestions are:

1) Stop planting elm trees until Dutch elm disease is under control.

2) Provide a single annual spraying while trees are dormant, without foliage and bark coverage can be most effective.

3) Confine DDT spraying to the
