WHAT DOCTORS SAY ABOUT:
• Parrot Fever
• Tooth Drilling

Q. Can you get "parrot fever" from any kind of bird?
A. Several years ago it was believed that people got parrot fever (psittacosis) only through contact with psittacine birds such as the parrot, parakeet, cockatoo, lovebird and macaw. It is now known that a psittacosis-like infection can occur in pigeons, chickens, turkeys, domestic ducks, finches and sea gulls. Most reported cases of psittacosis are due to contact with parrot-like birds but at least one epidemic of the disease occurred among turkey killers and dressers. Twenty-two persons were stricken with the disease.

Q. Can you get parrot fever from a parakeet that seems healthy?
A. Yes. Parrot fever virus can be spread by birds that look perfectly okay. In investigating a family epidemic of psittacosis, two Cleveland physicians found that before being sold, sick birds are sometimes "treated" by adding an antibiotic to their drinking water. Many birds get well at least well enough to be spread but they still harbor the virus. They become virus carriers and may transmit the disease to humans.

Q. Tooth pain can be deadened by giving an injection into the gums. A reader asks why dentists do not always inject a painkiller before drilling a tooth?
A. In most cases they will if the pain is going to be very severe. It may seem strange but dentists must be unusually careful in drilling a tooth after using a local painkiller. When the patient feels little or no pain it is harder to tell whether the tooth is being cut too fast and overheated. To avoid this the dentist cuts slowly in an "off and on" fashion to let the tooth cool or drills the tooth under a constant stream of cool water.
