A Look at Children's Concerts

I anticipated with much interest and nostalgia a concert given for children by the Detroit Symphony Orchestra Saturday morning. I remembered with pleasure the wonderful mornings I had spent as a member of a public school group privileged to attend similar concerts many years ago.

But like so many things which seemed better in the good old days, this concert unfortunately appeared to lack the careful planning and understanding of children' musical needs which made the concerts of the past enlightening as well as pleasureable.

The audience heard first a Mozart overture, written when the compoeer was only 11 years old. This was short and to the point. But then, the "Masquerade Suite" by Khatchaturian was played without an appropriate introduction to the prominent instruments so that the children might have a warm familiarity as the work proceeded.

There was no one like Mrs. Edith Rett-Tilton who always charmingly alerted her young audience to the looks and sounds of the orchestra so that we all had a wonderfully clear picture of just what shape made what sound—when.

IN SATURDAY'S concert, Walter Poole went on to play the "Spanish Caprice" by Rimsky-Kor-akov which is a showy thing for orchestra, and which some of the older members of the audience might well have enjoyed for it was played beautifully. But I fear many youngsters sitted restlessly about in their seats in lieu of some preparation by Poole which would have done much to capture the imagination and attention of young minds.

Arnold Mosenberg with the orchestra then skillfully narrated "Chuggy and the Blue Caboose" which appeared to appeal to most of the audience.

But more attention was paid to its story-line than to the music. modern harmonies, which weaved marvelously in and around and made little impression, naturally. So what we had was a fairly cute little story—nothing. I had the uncomfortable feeling, that did not really belong on a musical program.

OTHER OPPORTUNITIES for children to hear and soon come to love and understand music are almost unlimited today—the phonograph and radio are there for the asking. But nothing can match the impact on a child of attending a live musical performance and observing the instruments working and producing the wonderful sounds he hears.

As in many other art forms, there is a magnetism and thrill in watching something first hand that far transcends its appeal the use of the phonograph and radio.

When carefully planned and presented in a direct attempt to appeal to the young listener, such concerts may elicit a warm response and a newly awakened sense of the wonder at the world of music. And this may well provide a direct impetus to its further enjoyment in the home.

IT'S A mistake to think that great works must be watered down for young popular consumption. This is an error sometimes made by recording companies who often cut and generally mangle great works until they sound anemic and sometimes unrecognizable in an effort to appeal to the movie listener.

Fortunately, this has never been true of the Young People's Concerts. Whatever is played is played complete and uncut. The young listener thus becomes acquainted with the work as originally conceived by the composer.

However, it is equally important at the outset of the child's acquaintance with the work that some introductory material be presented to prepare the way to recognition and enjoyment.

WHEN THIS is accomplished and the young listener is initiated in an interesting as well as informative manner, he may have learned to set a pattern of intelligent listening that he will enjoy long after childhood.

We are indeed fortunate to have children's concerts available, but if these concerts are currently presented, they represent a venture which appears to require more careful planning attuned directly to the needs of the young listener.
