Strange Bedfellows
 Not many people realize the tremendous versatility of common wood. A Douglas fir tree, which produces some of the nation's finest lumber, may also give up quantities of vanilla, used to make flavoring. Or the same tree may supply the raw material for photographic film, explosives, plastic, tanning, sugar, alcohol and thousands of other useful products.

Trees Needs Lots Of Water to Grow
 A mature tree loses a lot of water every day through its leaves, and may need 500 pounds of water to grow one pound of dry weight. It's just as necessary to supply water to the tree as it is to fertilize it, points out Harold Schick, extension specialist in horticulture management at Michigan State University.
 WATER ALL trees when needed, soaking the ground to a depth of six inches. This means running a garden hose for at least one hour around the roots of the tree.
