People's Column
He Approves
New Store's Architecture

To the Editor:
As an aggressive Birmingham merchant, I take exception to the letter in last week's Birmingham Eccentric entitled "Peters' Colonial Architecture for IFham Stores." The writer states, "In every instance where the writer has been present the comment was not favorable."
I, too, have discussed the new Sportsman store with many local businessmen and friends and I state, "Many of us are anxiously awaiting this new and constructive type of architecture."
AS FOR ANY ONE person, even though he may be an authority, to criticize another person's taste in building is ridiculous.
This would be a drag and dreary existence if we all liked the same style of car or the same type of home and we all dressed in the same manner.
If the writer is truly sincere in desiring constructive criticism, why don't he point out these points:
1) The original store fronts that date back to the horse and buggy days that have never been improved.
2) The paper signs plastered across windows.
3) The half-painted brick walls on two-story buildings.

Medical Mirror What Doctors Say About

Mountains May Trouble Some People

Q. I am past 60. I moved to Colorado about one year ago. While here I am bothered by pressure in my ears, headache, exhaustion, and at times, difficulty breathing and rapid heart beat. Could it be the altitude?

A. Most people can go from sea level or a little above to altitudes of 5000 to 6000 feet with only minor difficulty. There is usually some ear fullness and perhaps some slight shortness of breath but adaptation occurs quite rapidly. Others may be affected to a greater degree and may have difficulty in making adjustments. Persons with certain conditions, notably coronary heart disease, should consider the possible ill-effects of residing at high altitudes. Specific advice should be obtained from your physician.

Q. Are some people more sensitive to pain than others?

A. Yes. The "pain-threshold" (point at which pressure applied to some part of the body causes pain) was determined in 363 normal persons. There was a wide variation in sensitivity to pain. A little pressure caused pain in some persons whereas others without considerable pressure without experiencing pain. Incidentally, these are known cases of complete insensitivity to pain. The condition seems to be inherited. One pain-resistant girl walked on a fractured ankle for 12 days before the increasing swelling led to medical consultation. It was then discovered that she was insensible to pain.

Your prescription dollars buy more cure today than ever before. While the cost of some medicines may seem high, they may actually save you hundreds of dollars in hospital bills, hospital expenses and loss of income.
