The Proper Care of Shrubs Means Many Years of Beauty

The occasional pruning of shrubs is very important - a fact which many times is overlooked by the home-owner until it is too late. The Michigan Association of Nurserymen advises that the most successful work today requires a certain amount of pruning, depending somewhat on the location of the plants and the effect desired.

The pruning of shrubs serves as a preventive as before. These shrubs which are pruned will increase the bloom and will also retard the height, resulting in a more attractive and compact plant.

Different varieties of shrubs call for a different pruning technique, but the general principle is to prune immediately after flowering. For the shrubs which are planned for their berry effect this will result in the loss of some fruit, but it is necessary if the shrub is to be kept from becoming leggy and unsightly.

Next, go to the top of the plant and cut back the remaining branches to the level desired. The remaining should be made just above a side or lateral branch so that no stubs are left.

START IN THE center of the plant, cutting back to the highest point desired. In the case of plants where the sides are reached first, the shrub should be pruned in a natural, irregular contour, rather than in a harsh, geometric one.
