

Sayers Presents
Waterford Twp.'s Industrial Picture

James Sayers, public relations director of the Professional Engineer's Association, Birmingham, who is spearheading a drive to establish an industrial development committee in the Oakland county township, assisted the Waterford board in organizing the initial steps for an industrial development program last week by presenting the industrial picture of the township.

"Waterford township, which encompasses 36 square miles, has 56,000 residents," he said, "and the population will almost double by 1970." However, our tax base is such that we obtain less than one-fourth of every tax dollar from industry, and this doesn't allow much for public utilities and improvements. We also want to provide jobs for our growing population, and to do this, we need new industry.

ACCORDING TO Sayers, out of the 55,000 residents in the township, only about 200 are employed by the five local industries. "Without the economic boost industry gives a community, we aren't able to progress at the rate we'd like," he said.

Kenneth Houch, industrial agent of the Michigan Economic Development department, outlined the necessity of having an enthusiastic organization behind the area's industrial development efforts and suggested the township make an industrial survey of the community to provide an inventory of its assets for industry and any deficiencies which may require correction.
