Bendix officials study blueprint plans for a new Advanced Power Laboratory to be added to the Research Laboratories division, located at Northwestern and 10 1/2 Mile road, Southfield, Michigan. Dr. R. D. O'Neal, vice-president in charge of Engineering for the corporation, points out features of the new building to laboratory executives Dr. W. E. Kock (right), director and general

Bendix Moves 'Earth' for 'Space' Projects

The Bendix corporation is not only going all out, but "way out" in its expansion program designed to further the study of space travel. Expressing confidence in the economic and industrial future of the state, Malcolm P. Ferguson, 31050 Stafford, Beverly Hills, president of Bendix announced construction plans for another new facility to be added to the Research Laboratories division in Southfield, Michigan. Establishment of the new Power Laboratory will enable Bendix research scientists to develop and test extremely compact space vehicle control and power systems which will be required in the exploration by man of the moon and near planets.

SPECIALLY designed for very high temperature and pneumatic testing, the new labyrinth-type building will contain three test cells and a central control station. To insure the safety of the operators, walls are constructed of two-inch thick reinforced concrete with blow-out panels; toxic will be monitored through bullet-proof glass observation ports and by remote closed circuit TV. Special provision will be made for the storage of highly volatile exotic fuels. Development of the Bendix cold gas reaction controller, a revolutionary type of reaction control, successfully used to stabilize Discoverer satellites in their polar orbit of the earth, has led to advanced space vehicle research contracts now requiring more powerful and longer-lived hot gas control systems.

As man pushes farther into space, the new power generation systems and controls will be using exotic fuels that produce gases of such high temperatures as 3500-5000° F. Working with such materials and simulating actual flight conditions in a laboratory presents a number of unique testing problems which Bendix scientists say will be solved by the new Power Laboratory. ADVANCED AIR research contracts now under development at the labs include hot gas flight stabilization systems for the Air Force Wright Air Development division and jet stabilized and controlled radar antennas for the U. S. Navy Bureau of Weapons, Bendix manner, and Dr. G. A. Rossetto (left), 884 Woodlea, Birmingham, assistant general manager and associate director. The new structure, second addition to the Research Laboratories this year, will enable Bendix research scientists to test extremely compact space vehicle control and power systems that will be required in the exploration of the moon and near planets.

Introducing Queen's Fancy

CLASSIC - HANDSOME - AUTHENTIC
by LYON

Now! An exciting pattern in the classic style of Louis XV. The first time such a richly "carved" design has been attempted in stainless steel! Only the most talented craftsmen could do the intricate die work and expert burnishing required to produce this exquisite and authentic design.

And best of all, Queen's Fancy, like all Lyon Stainless, need never be polished, for the finish is tarnish- and stain-proof. Come in and see this pattern now and be sure to see the complete set of serving pieces, including many items that are beautifully pierced.
