You Can Condition Whole House 2 Ways

There's no need or excuse to "suffer" through the summers nowadays; modern air conditioning can be as near a reality for you and yours as a trip to your air conditioning dealer or contractor; as easily financed as any other home improvements or appliances you buy.

There are two general types of air conditioning—central system and room air conditioners.

THE ROOM units, placed in several parts of the house, are being used increasingly for whole-house cooling.

The central kind, of course, requires ducts. If ductwork already exists for your heating system, it's easy to add on a cooling unit or put in a new system that both heats and cools. Or strong, economical galvanized steel ductwork can be installed in many houses. Your air conditioning contractor can tell if this is practical for your house.

ONE CENTRAL air conditioning system cools and heats by gas. A measure of its quality is that it's largely made of steel—including about 60 pounds of stainless steel, used chiefly in the unit generator.

Here a small gas flame boils a simple salt solution that is circulated to other parts of the system.

Cool comfort for the whole house also can be achieved with individual room air conditioners—placed in several parts of the house.

YOUR DEALER will survey your house for the correct placement of units of proper capacity.

Separate units—which eliminate need for ductwork—can be installed quickly, and additional units added as your budget may allow.

One advantage of room air conditioners is that members of the family in different rooms can adjust degrees of coolness to suit their whims and preferences.

This easy adjustability can be economical as well; a unit may be turned completely off when a room is not in use.

Colors Available

Automatic dishwashers are available today to match almost any kitchen's color scheme.

Besides being manufactured in a number of basic colors, many new models come with a feature that permits the front panel to be interchanged. Some of the panels are stainless steel, antique copper, and popular kitchen colors.

Adjusting Screw

New kind of metal jackposts have adjusting screw at bottom. After placement, screw can be set in concrete to meet FHA requirements.

HOME IMPROVEMENT SECTION

New Novel Ceiling

Ceilings don't have to be a flat uninteresting plaster. Some architects and designers are using tongue-and-groove exterior siding, as well as wide drop siding, for ceilings with telling effect. The drop siding gives interesting shadow lines.
