WHAT DOCTORS SAY ABOUT
Misconception About Glasses
● Mushrooms
● Split Lip
● Glands and Hair
Q. If I wear my glasses faithfully (I am nearsighted) will I need them later on? I am 14.
A. You probably will. In fact, nearsightedness (myopia) tends to increase with growth and age. No harm comes of not wearing corrective glasses constantly other than that which may result from inability to see distant objects on such occasions.
Q. Is there any test to tell the difference between nonpoisonous and poisonous mushrooms?
A. No, there is no simple test to distinguish edible mushrooms from poisonous ones (toadstools).
Q. I have had a split in my lower lip for quite some time. It heals, only to break open when I talk or smile. Is there any medicine to use that will heal the split permanently?
A. You should, we think, see a doctor. The chronic split or fissure may have produced some slight scarring or thickening of the tissue. If so, medical assistance is necessary to achieve permanent healing.
Q. Recently I was told that there is a gland which causes excessive hair growth on the face and body of women. Is this true? Would an operation help?
A. First, there is a rather wide range of normality in hair growth, and allowance must be made for the individual's racial and family background. If it is decided that hair growth is abnormal, any of several possible causes may be involved. The trouble could lie in the pituitary gland, the adrenal glands, or the ovaries. The age of the patient could have some bearing. As an example, increased facial hair is often noted in women past the menopause. The cause of excess facial hair must first be determined, and treatment planned accordingly. Very often no specific trouble can be detected and the only solution is to remove the hair locally by one of several methods. The entire problem should, of course, be discussed with your doctor.
