Academy of the Sacred Heart

Special Writer

The annual father-daughter tree planting was held on Nov. 5. The children and their fathers cultivated the 395 trees which were planted by them in former years. After this activity, all gathered at the outside grill for lunch. The school is preparing for the mother-daughter tea scheduled for Dec. 9. Each class has a share in the preparations for the occasion—in the baking of the cookies, making of decorations, arranging the tables and other duties. The seniors will also assist their mothers as hostesses during the tea.

This week the Middle School will hold a "Literary" in preparation for the Vicarize Essay Contest. The students will try to retain the essay trophy which they won last spring in competition with other Sacred Heart schools.

Among those reading their compositions are Judith Fehr, Mary Risdon, Milmary Matthews, Adele Margrave, Mary Forbes, Jane Johnston, Maureen Judge, Mary Ellen Quinn and Judith Sanders. The school competes with the Sacred Heart Academies of Grosse Pointe, Greenwich and Norton, Connecticut; 21st Street, N. Y. City, and the academies of Albany, Rochester and Buffalo in New York state.

Costly Palaces Not Necessary For Our Schools

ANN ARBOR — Costly palaces for schools are not needed, says Dean Phillip N. Youtz of The University of Michigan College of Architecture and Design. School architects agree with taxpayers in recommending intelligent economy in school design, he says. "A white elephant or a palace is a bad recommendation for a professional man."

However, the architect has no use for shoddy work likely to prove expensive to maintain and impossible to enlarge to meet growing needs, Dean Youtz points out. "Architects must produce better schools—more economical, more effective in providing a setting for learning, and more flexible for changes and additions. The school architect should prepare himself to think as an educator," Youtz maintains.

HOW MUCH money should a community spend on a school project to meet growing needs? "The answer differs in various parts of the country, but the school architect tries to balance present requirements and probable future needs with the realities of the community budget. He submits to the school board comparative costs and points out items on which they can economize," Youtz says. "The architect strives to maintain high standards so that the students and teachers may benefit by the best space arrangement, lighting, color, sanitation, heating and cooling, and most important of all, enjoy imaginative surroundings which will contribute to creative learning."
