PEOPLE'S COLUMN

Railroads Defended In Hauling of Freight

THE LETTER in the Jan. 26 issue relative to automobile hauling requires an answer to clarify some aspects of the situation which was not presented.

The appeal to protect the livelihood of truck operators is intended to arouse the emotions of the reader in defense of a method of operation which has been unfair to the general public from its inception.

Due to past regulatory practices aimed at fostering competition, freight rates have been established at levels which have enabled long-haul trucks to take over many bulk loadings which previously went to the railroad.

This was done in spite of obvious economic advantages which one method may have had over the other.

NONE OF OUR railroads are in such financial positions that they could stand further losses on top of steadily declining revenue, even for a short time. Also, should they try to raise rates later (assuming that it were possible to eliminate all truck competition) there would be an immediate move by truckers back into the field.

There is no longer an era wherein the railroads enjoy any monopolistic advantages, though that has been true in the past.

Now they have a competitor in every thing they do, and they should be permitted to compete freely and fairly without artificial and historically-biased restraints. If they can do a job better than someone else, by all means let them do it.

IT HAS ALWAYS been true in our economy that there are constant readjustments in employment due to improved methods. It is only through these improvements that we increase our standard of living.

More output per man permits more consumption per man. This is the only real road to economic progress. Any restrictions on this basic rule must result in loss to all of us.

Final Reductions

How much highway can you buy with the $450 annual fees mentioned by the writer? Not even enough to park the truck on, let alone drive it any place.

If the general public were not paying for the roads, the trucks would be an example of delivery advantage at each end of the run may offset the economic inefficiency of being up an expensive tractor and the services of a driver or two for the entire trip.
