Mellowed Furniture Better, Says Writer

By RUTH VOGT
Special Writer

When a furniture-designer announced at a recent show in Chicago that one is able to 'mix, and yes, even to mismatch different periods of furniture,' the eye roamed around the house and the heart let out a relieved sigh.

What was seen was treasured all the more since a designer had made this authentic. Would he be shocked, however, if he found out that a few had been doing this trick, out of necessity, for a good many years?

Surely he labors not under the conception that the average couple, when first setting up housekeeping, rushes into a store with a huge reserve in the bank and braced with a firm knowledge of 'what's good and in excellent taste'? They don't.

EVEN if the couple sensed what was tops in design, the little item of having to pay for the stuff over long periods forbids buying the 'right' davenport, end-tables 'n lamps to go with them.

Lurking in the background is the vision of a stove, washing machine and kitchen table plus chairs that must be picked.

No matter how much a lassie might drool over an original French Provincial couch, knowing that it's constructed magnificently well, she must view it in regards to little feet wanting to climb up on it with the thought that a story could be told perhaps.

WHENEVER an elegant front room is walked into the first impulse is to blurt out, "Did you do all this by your ownself?" And it's these very same rooms that shout such taste that a person finds the question of where he'll sit down a big problem.

It takes a lot of courage to plunk down on a white velvet love seat; but if all the rest of the chairs are covered with tufted fragile looking posies, there's little choice. Immediately the personality changes; you want to, somehow, be better than what you are. That's a strain, too.

Of course one can carry the idea of holding onto old furniture just too far. A few Thanksgiving dinners ago a favorite brother-in-law sat in a chair which refused to support him through the dinner hour.

AFTER a kitchen chair was lugged in so he could enjoy the meal to the end, he made the suggestion that perhaps the time had arrived in our married lives that we should consider getting rid of our initial dining room set.

We started looking right after New Year's but since one of the beds suddenly 'gave up the ghost' by dropping its under boards right on the floor it was decided to buy a new bedroom set.

The said couch arose, the next Thanksgiving, the same chair that had been carefully glued together!

"I'll give you one more year," he sighed, "please consider my idea again?" We promised him we would.

NO ONE will deny that it's an exciting experience to walk through one of the many 'outfitted model homes' now on display through out the area. In every front room the furniture goes together just right.

Where a corner calls for a tall green plant, there stands a tall green plant. Where a desk needs to be placed at the correct right angle, there stands a desk to match the couch and chairs. Books are scattered about in the right spots. Somehow it all looks too planned, too perfect.

"Do you know what this room needs?" was whispered Sunday before last to my companion.

HE ANSWERED, "Sure, It calls for a few smudges on the carpet, a couple of finger marks on the wall and it wouldn't hurt to have some marks showing on the coffee table!"

Furniture's a funny thing. Until it's lived with, loved a whole lot and really used and enjoyed (and this takes decades) it's still merely stiff and formal pieces of wood put together by some foreign hands.

Same way with the structure called 'home.' The walls and beams are plaster and lathes until they reflect and absorb the sounds, words, laughter, tears too, of the inhabitants who dwell therein.

It takes people to bring furniture 'n home alive. When they get shabby-like and worn, that's when they're loved all the more!
