we'd be blindfolded to the constant flow of new products and services designed to make our lives more enjoyable.

"This morning, I washed with a gentle new soap that contains soothing cold cream . . . pressed a button on a wondrous new toothpaste can . . . shaved with an unbe-lievably keen new superblade . . . relieved my sore throat with a potent new gargle . . . gained self confidence for the day with a new roll-on deodorant . . . groomed life into my hair with a dandruff-fighting hair lotion.

My new crease-proof wash and wear shirt and miracle-fibre blend suit keeps me crisp all day . . . a new electronic watch keeps tabs on appointments . . my giant-refill ballpoint pen seems capable of writing forever.

From compact cars to computers, from 2-way pocket radios to stereo with concentric tweeters, from electric eye cameras to long playing records, from recessed filter cigarettes to contact lenses, from remote control TV to ripple arestes to contact senses, from remote control TV to ripple sole shoes, from aluminum engines to electronic ovens, from odorless paint to permanent antifreeze, imaginative technology brings an endless flow of new excitement to daily living." Economists predict a 25% "betterment" of our American living standards by 1970.

Without advertising, such growth would be inconceivable. Without advertising, the link between maker and buyer without advertising, the interest would be non-existent. Without advertising, neither the knowledge of new products and services, nor the demand for them would be present, to any great degree. Without advertising, we'd be blindfolded to progress, and soon would hear its death knell.

Keenly competitive advertising is truly in the public interest. For the most part, it is sincere. It informs. It dramatically presents the merits of the offered products or services. While it actively persuades, it cannot force a purchase. It cannot make a reader's decision, nor extract

The buyer is king. Thanks to advertising, he goes forth to spend more wisely, and enjoy life more fully.
