Business sits for its portrait

An advertisement, or a series of advertisements, is more than anything else a picture of the business that signs it. From its very tone, you know what kind of people will back . . . or back away from . . . its claims.

The personality of the advertiser peers through the lines of his "copy," and from experience you learn to trust such advertisers. They lead you to values instead of leading you astray. They want your business, of course, but they want your confidence and friendship, without which your business is like something written on ice and set in the sun.

Advertising, reduced to its simplest terms, is a means of mass communication, bringing you information you should have before opening an account or even a checkbook. It is a beacon for buyers to keep them off the shoals of the shoddy. It is something to be read, heard, and believed!
