Postal Costs in B'ham Up If New Bill Passes

Special to the Eccentric

NEW YORK — To what extent will the current bill to increase postal rates affect people in Birmingham, if approved? What will it cost them on an annual basis?

As estimated, local residents and business concerns will have to pony up an additional $136,448 a year.

The measure has already breezed through the House on a voice vote and is now before the Senate. Quick approval of it by that body is also expected.

The scheduled rate rise, $701 million, goes beyond the amount sought by the Kennedy administration in its proposal to Congress. It asked for a $621 million boost in revenue to cope with the annual deficit incurred by the Post Office Department.

Some $455 million of that sum are to come from an increase in first class rates. This will be accomplished chiefly by charging 5 cents instead of 4 cents on ordinary letters.

THE MEASURE will also have a big impact on newspapers, magazines and other commercial mailings, with an increase of about $53 million.

Third class mail will also get a huge hike. The bill calls for $79 million beyond the $93 million requested by the administration. This affects bulk mail.

In Birmingham, in the past fiscal year, a total of $718,182 was spent for stamps and other postal services, according to the official government figures.

This will rise to an estimated $854,630 under the new rates, assuming average conditions locally.

STRONG OPPOSITION has come from the publishing industry, which claims it will be hard hit by the increase.

Users of first class mail are also objecting to the 25 per cent rise for ordinary letters, on the ground that such mail is more than paying its way already.

The administration, however, seeks to put the postal service as a whole on a self-sustaining basis, holding that it is purely a business operation and should stand on its own financial feet.

The opposing attitude is that carrying the mails is a public service and that any deficits should be paid out of general revenues.

If you are buying, selling, renting or swapping. The Birmingham Eccentric Classified Ads will do an outstanding job for you.
