A Community Project

Junior College Assumes New Role

The community junior college—neither a glorified high school nor a decapitated college—stands ready to provide post-high school education for all the children of all the people and for all the people, too. Today, one out of every four high school graduates who continues his formal education does so in one of the 700 junior colleges throughout the country, the Michigan and National Education Assn. reports. All but nine states have public junior colleges and the U. S. Office of Education predicts that all states will have them by 1975. What is a junior college? Generally speaking, it is a post-high school educational institution which usually offers a two-year program either of terminal nature or as preparation for further study at a four-year college or university. In most cases, junior colleges award a "second chance" to those who are dropped out of school too early. Junior college educators stand ready to provide almost any course in which adults in a community show an interest.

OVER THE years, as the junior college movement has grown and expanded, many suggestions have been put forth as to the purposes junior colleges should serve. Although there is considerable variation from one institution to another, most junior colleges now perform several unique and valuable functions.

1. They provide terminal technical, and semi-professional education of two years' duration or less adapted to the needs of the student and those of the community or region in which the junior college is located.
2. They provide education in the arts and sciences at the level of the first two years of college, but designed specifically for a two-year, as opposed to a four-year, schedule.
3. They provide arts-and-sciences and pre-professional education equivalent to the first two years of a four-year college, thereby eliminating much of the enrollment pressures on the four-year institution.
4. They offer a wide choice of general education and special courses for adults to help them train and retain to meet present and future employment requirements, to keep active, and to make wide use of their leisure time.

Because junior colleges draw their students almost exclusively from local or area high school graduates, they allow many teenagers who are too young to go away to college to remain at home for a longer period of time. Junior colleges also provide excellent opportunity for the transition from secondary school to college—there is no emotional strain of leaving family and friends.

Costs are generally low at junior colleges, sometimes almost free for students in some tax-supported institutions.

"LATE BLOOMERS," who have college-level capabilities but low high school grades, can prove themselves by doing well in a junior college and thereby win acceptance to a senior college. Also, those students who did not take the essential college-preparatory courses in high school can make up deficiencies without losing time.

Junior colleges are often the best choice for those who want to enter one of the technical occupations. The person who drops out of senior college after two years is not as good a prospect for employment in a technical occupation as one who completes a two-year junior college program with such employment as his original goal.

The flexibility in organizing junior college curricula makes it possible to meet local vocational needs. Students are trained for specific jobs which are known to be available in the community or region.

There is little chance that a student will be turned aside because facilities are full. Junior colleges can expand readily as need dictates. Dropout rates caused from too much attention to social affairs is much lower in junior colleges than in large senior colleges. Junior colleges offer a better opportunity for making friends, for effective group participation, and for developing leadership abilities.

COUNSELING facilities are usually more adequate than in senior colleges. Faculty members gener-

Music, Rain Hit Right Key; Bring Prize

Music and rain have gone hand-in-hand with the Lawrence Loftis family, 7104 Brookridge, Birmingham, ever since they visited New York City last month. While in New York, Loftis' wife, Donna, was selected from the audience to appear on "The Price is Right" TV show, she won a brand new piano. But if it hadn't been for the show, she never would have gone to the show. The Loftis family decided to tour a TV studio for one principle reason: it was pouring outside and they didn't want to get wet. SO WHILE THEY waited for the tour they decided to buy tickets to a program, and program they picked was "The Price is Right."
