National Council of Churches Explains Structure, Functions

Editor's Note: The following article is the first of a series on the life and work of the nation's largest religious organization. The second article, which appears next week, will discuss the articles were issued by the office of information of the National Council of Churches.

What can the churches do better together than alone? Oppose the growing strength of the forces which challenge the Christian Gospel by "reforming each with the strength of all."

So say the leaders of 33 Protestant and Eastern Orthodox communities and to his end they together through the National Council of Churches which they themselves formed 10 years ago.

Country is so widely held by the country does not speak for the nearly 40 million churchgoers represented by the member denominations. It does serve them in the fields of Christian education, foreign and social issues, moral and social conditions, and other matters affecting spiritual, moral and social conditions of the church and its Christian believers who must carry on.

THE COUNCIL is charged by the member denominations to represent and maintain more than 70 program in these fields. Each program is directed by qualified staff who are in turn under the supervision and guidance of interdenominational committees made up of more than 5,000 members from the churches.

Administrative authority over the council is vested in its triennial general assembly, which consists of 650 delegates and 350 laymen appointed by member communions. Interim decisions are made by the general board which meets three times a year. Member denominations are represented on the board by 102 clergymen and 51 laymen. The council has, in its short 10-year history, managed to create an impressive record of service to the churches and the country.

FOR ITS WORK in "pointing up the differences between Christianity and Communism and the unique values of the American way of life," the Council in April, 1957, honored the George Washington Honor Medal Award of the Freedom Foundation with the 1956 award.

The council received the award, together with the ABC network, for a series of radio, television and film commission entitled "Christianity and Communism." It was the first time that the award had been given to a religious organization.

Entries may be submitted beginning March 11. The contest ends April 15.

THE COUNCIL'S constitution makes it clear it is an agency of the churches, established by them to serve them, and through its policy-making general board of member church representatives to speak to the churches on matter of Christian social concern.

The council has been misrepresented by the churches, nothing is further from the truth.

When the Council speaks on issues of Christian concern, it is in the elected or appointed leadership of the member denominations, together speak to their churches on these issues.

Today the Council, together with over 1,000 county, city and state councils of churches, symbolizes one of the most important developments in the Reformation. It is an expression of the growing unity and cooperation of the Protestant and Eastern Orthodox churches of America.
