

Horse Rustlers

Cranbrook got its "Wounded Horse" back. Early in November the institution announced the 250 pound granite sculpture by the late Carl Milles had been missing for about four weeks. An anonymous phone call, following the announcement, to Wallace Mitchell, director of the Cranbrook Galleries, explained the sculpture had been removed because it wasn't being displayed properly, and that if officials would consider finding a new location for it, the statue's whereabouts would be revealed. The horse was finally found near a railroad track in Bloomfield Hills and promptly put in a new location.
