B'ham Income Jumps 163% In 15 Years

NEW YORK — How much has Birmingham progressed, economically, in the past 15 years? What has its growth rate been, compared to that in other areas?

The need for continuous economic expansion has been thoroughly discussed by the experts — but only from the standpoint of the United States as a whole.

Such national growth, however, is the sum total of what takes place, varying degrees, in the cities, towns and villages across the country.

And, for the residents of any given community, the question that is of prime importance is, "How are we doing here at home?"

Also, to the individual family in that community, what is of still greater concern is its own personal progress and its own standard of living.

RECENT STUDIES by the Department of Commerce, by sales management and by others indicate the changes that have taken place, nationally and in specific locations, in the last 15 years.

In Birmingham, they show, the average family has moved from a net, after-tax income of $5,500 in 1947 to a net of $15,025 in 1962.

This, however, is in terms of current dollars, which do not take into account the change in the value of the dollar.

The real gain amounts to only three-fifths of that increase, it is noted, because of the rise in the cost of living during the period.

The current income level in the local area represents, therefore, a true rise of 163 per cent in purchasing power since 1947.

THIS COMPARES favorably with the rise reported for the United States, 58 per cent, and with $3 per cent in the East North Central States.

The Government's figures show that family income, measured in present values, went up $1,800 nationally between 1947 and 1962. It
