

Book on Vietnam Published On Day of Revolt

A new book on South Vietnam by a Michigan State University professor was published coincidentally with the political revolt in Saigon.

"South Vietnam: Nation Under Stress," written by Robert Scigliano, an MSU political science professor, was officially published by Houghton-Mifflin Nov. 1, the day the Diem government fell.

The book is an analysis and assessment of major developments in South Vietnam during its nine years of independence.

Number I-94 Freeway Interchanges

Interchanges on Interstate 94 will be numbered next year, State Highway Commissioner John C. Mackie announced recently.

The numbering will be done on the mileage system. It will cost an estimated $20,000 to number the interchanges on the 225-mile freeway between New Buffalo and Detroit.

Mackie said the numbering of interchanges would be confined initially to one Interstate route for two reasons.

"First, we want time to test motorist reaction to the numbering plan before we go ahead with other freeways. Any numbering plan is going to last as long as the freeway and we want to make haste slowly in this area," Mackie said.

"Secondly, there is the practical fact that only one freeway can be signed in time for next year's peak summer traffic."

If the motorist is going to exit at Interchange 50 and is at Interchange 25, he knows he has 25 miles to go before his exit point.

The motorist who forgets the last interchange number has the mileage markers to remind him of his location in relation to his exit, Mackie explained.

"The same mileage numbering system also can be used to number auxiliary points along the freeway if desired at some future time—rest areas, for example, and non-interchange structures," Mackie pointed out.

IT IS ALSO possible to add interchanges later without disturbing the number pattern.

The mileage system of numbering is one of two systems in use in the United States. The other system is to number interchanges in consecutive order without regard to mileage.

"We think the mileage system of numbering will best fit Michigan's interchange with the rest of the State freeways and Interstate freeways," Mackie said. He said that informal opinions of highway department engineers in other states at their recent convention in Portland, Oregon, yielded no guidance for Michigan. Most other states, Mackie said, are not far enough along in their freeway systems to have thought seriously about numbering interchanges.

MACKIE SAID that Interstate 75 between Toledo and Detroit and Interstate 96 from Muskegon to Detroit would be the next routes to be numbered, probably in 1965, if the system proves successful.

Interstate 75 won't be numbered until final contracts were in 1967 to build the link from Bay City to Grayling because the exact mileage and number of interchanges won't be known until the route location is final.

Highway Department traffic engineers have been studying interchange numbering for many months, Mackie said.

"Either system—the consecutive mileage or the consecutive interchange system—has some problems attached to it," Mackie said. "But the mileage system seems to offer

Church Features Universal Customs

"Around the Christmas World" theme the Dec. 19 holiday party for the adult congregation of Northwest Unitarian-Universalist Church, Southfield.

The evening's entertainment will include a presentation of international Christmas customs from material furnished by Detroit's International Institute.

Music will be under the direction of Mrs. Anna Forbat, a former student of Bela Bartok, Hungarian composer and a graduate of the Franz Liszt Academy of Budapest. Vocal selections will be by one of her pupils, Kathy Sirko, a recent arrival from the Ukraine. Featured also will be holiday dances by one of the Inasuite folk dance troupes.

Refreshments will be typical of those served at Christmas in various countries. Christmas carols will complete the evening's program.

The least problems and the most advantages."

Introduction Is Important to Discussion

How to introduce a problem for group discussion is a question that deserves, but seldom gets, serious attention from discussion leaders, according to a University of Michigan psychologist.

Even if a leader knows precisely the nature of a problem to present, there are many ways to introduce it, said Prof. Norman R. F. Maier, who has devoted many years to research on group problem solving.

For example, "statements of problems that produce emotional reactions rather than an intellectual interest hinder rather than facilitate problem solving." Often the leader presents a problem in vague terms to avoid hurting someone's feelings or to achieve several objectives at the same time.

But the statement of the problem is of particular importance because it sets the mood of the meeting, Maier noted.

"THIS SKILL area is important enough to warrant careful preparation preceding a conference," he said. There are some guiding principles for aiding the problem-solving process and avoiding emotional responses.

First, state the problem in situational rather than behavioral terms. Changing situations is desirable to utilize all of these principles, unless any use of these principles, every leader should be encouraged if he can incorporate the first two principles into his initial attempts with statements of problems.

"Since it is not uncommon for discussion leaders to violate all of these principles, almost any use of them represent a gain."

Various skills and methods that may help a conference leader are examined by Maier in his latest book, "Problem-Solving Discussions and Conferences."

problem, he would find that the resulting participation he obtains will materially improve.

Sixth, Essential information should be shared.

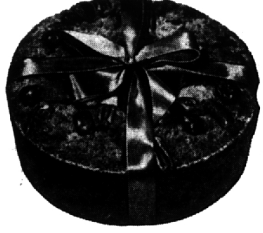

Said Maier, "Although it is desirable to utilize all of these principles, unless any use of these principles, every leader should be encouraged if he can incorporate the first two principles into his initial attempts with statements of problems."

"Since it is not uncommon for discussion leaders to violate all of these principles, almost any use of them represent a gain."
