Section Fence Gives Privacy To Back Yard

Are you one of those families that owns a home where it is almost impossible to have privacy?

A corner lot with the house right against the sidewalk, a house jammed right up against the neighbor's house, or a house where passing headlights shine right into your windows?

This may help you solve your problem, as one landscape architect helped a western family.

YOU CAN USE a screening fence which will shut out the view of passers-by but which can be so designed that you won't have the feeling of living behind a wall.

One of the best screens is a louvered type fence with the louvers set to keep out prying eyes but arranged so that breezes will keep air circulating.

You can arrange these screening fences in a solid fence, or as sectional screens, eight to ten feet long or longer, screens can be set at slight angles to give an interesting line to the installation.

Most screens are built with western red cedar posts and the louvers or boards can be either cedar or Douglas fir.

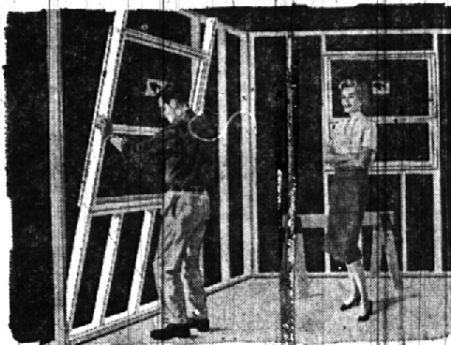

In addition to the louvered pattern you can use solid panels, pickets, slats, or board-on-board styles.

THE PRINCIPAL thing is that you can change an otherwise poorly located home into something choice and private with a relatively inexpensive fence or sectional.

You can also add a sparkling of color to your yard if you decide to paint the fence sections by using some of the new and exciting pastel shades of paint which are available.

However, you can let nature weather your wood fence to a silvery grey.
