Twelve Predictions on Culture '64

By CAROLYN HALL

Looking back today, we wonder if the 1964-65 arts season was as exciting or as influential as any of the seasons of the past dozen years. The answer is a qualified yes.

1. More publics will have a taste for art. They'll see it on TV, in magazines, and on the walls of their homes. This is a trend that's been developing for years and now it seems to be catching on.

2. The museum will become a place of education. People will go to museums not just to see art, but to learn about it. This is already happening in many places, and it's only going to get better.

3. Art will be more accessible. The idea of art as an elitist, exclusive club is fading. More people are going to art galleries and museums, and more art is being created that's accessible to everyone.

4. Art will be more interdisciplinary. Artists are working with writers, musicians, and even scientists. This is a trend that's been developing for a while, and it's only going to get stronger.

5. The public will be more involved in the arts. People will be more interested in what's going on in the arts world, and they'll want to be more involved. This is already happening, and it's only going to get stronger.

6. Art will be more diverse. People will be more interested in art from different cultures and different periods. This is a trend that's been developing for a while, and it's only going to get stronger.

7. Art will be more political. Artists will be more interested in using their art to make a statement about political issues. This is a trend that's been developing for a while, and it's only going to get stronger.

8. Art will be more commercial. Artists will be more interested in making money from their art. This is a trend that's been developing for a while, and it's only going to get stronger.

9. Art will be more accessible. More people will be able to afford art, and more art will be created that's accessible to everyone. This is a trend that's been developing for a while, and it's only going to get stronger.

10. Art will be more educational. More people will be interested in using art to learn about other cultures and other periods. This is a trend that's been developing for a while, and it's only going to get stronger.

11. Art will be more diverse. More people will be interested in art from different cultures and different periods. This is a trend that's been developing for a while, and it's only going to get stronger.

12. Art will be more political. More people will be interested in using art to make a statement about political issues. This is a trend that's been developing for a while, and it's only going to get stronger.
