

THE GOLDEN YEARS

You don't have to add to rage on a part-time basis but found a good retirement. But it helps. By retirement age it doesn't matter much either.

The average man at age 65 or so can walk down the street wearing a red and white plaid suit with yellow button shoes, and selling bow-and-arrows, to Indians, and nobody really cares. There's no longer any company to embarrass, and no boss to glare at over his specs.

Roger P. Gilbreth wasn't the yellow-button-shoe type. But by the customs of today he was an oddball—a real one.

He had been a freight executive, making about $16,000 a year, had a nice home, a couple of shares of good stock and belonged to the usual civic and luncheon-club circuit.

WHEN HE passed his 64th birthday he figured he had had it. The job was no longer fun, and he wasn't going anywhere with it in one more year.

He retired, with a small cut in pension and Social Security, but still enough for his needs.

Mr. Gilbreth had always loved cars—tinkering with them, tuning them, but mostly driving them. On vacations he always wanted to drive somewhere, as far away as possible.

On week ends, when only Sundays because Saturdays took him back to his office, he would always get in his car and drive.

WHEN HE wanted to be free to drive all he wanted to do was figure there might be a smart way to do it—for pay, for instance.

He tried to get a job as limousine chauffeur with a taxi company. No luck. He landed a job in a garage on a part-time basis but found he was lying under a chassis more often than he was sitting behind a wheel, and gave it up.

He tackled a job driving a merchandise truck, but this wasn't like driving a car.

ALTHOUGH HE tried or considered about a dozen part-time jobs that dealt with cars and driving. Then he discovered camera films.

There was a plant in town that processed both color and black-and-white films, and a major part of its business was the rolls of films amateurs bring into drug stores and camera shops to be developed and printed.

The plant served several outlets in town, and also served an outlet area that included five small towns with a total of eight outlets.

THREE TIMES A WEEK the plant sent a courier, in a company car, to the outlying towns to pick up the rolls and deliver the processed ones. This is the job Mr. Gilbreth got. He was delighted with it.

The route covered about 120 miles. Every Monday, Wednesday and Friday morning he set out from the plant at 8:30 and was free to go home when he finished the rounds. At the start he was efficient, and finished in about four hours.

But he began making friends in the outlying towns, and started to talk. He now gets home between 2 and 3 in the afternoon.

Sighing for the job was a problem. Mr. Gilbreth wanted to make just enough to lose his Social Security.

The plant thought this was a nice job. It had never gotten the job done with such a price before. So everybody's happy.
