Patient's Family May Need Help

"The patient who is presented to the physician is not always the one who most requires attention," says the University of Michigan psychiatrist.

In an article appearing in the U-M Medical Center Journal, Dr. Jack C. Westman cautioned physicians that some of the most puzzling medical conditions call for treating the patient's family, rather than the patient.

The purely scientific practice of medicine cannot always identify these problems, he said. Rather, science needs the aid of skilled intuition, based on knowledge of the patient's total family situation.

HE CITED as an example, the over-protective mother who finds that the onset of diabetes in her daughter gives her free rein to pamper the girl.

"This kind of mother unwittingly exaggerates her daughter's disease. In extreme cases, the mother may be unable to accept the daughter in any other role than that of a patient."

Also, "The pediatrician knows that recurrent streptococcal infections in a child calls for treating the infection when it is passed from one member of the family to another . . . The allergist knows that some asthmatic children improve when removed from exposure to the personalities of their parents . . ."

"Paradoxically," he said, "we need to re-inject into the practice of medicine some of the principles that were the backbone of medical practice some years ago. We have come full circle from . . . a complete picture of the individual, through preoccupation with his organ systems, to the discovery that he is a whole person and back once again to seeing him as part of his family world."
