Recording History as It Happens

In the preparation of this centennial issue of The Eccentric, we were repeatedly impressed with the fact that the newspaper, (The Eccentric of course) has been our chief and most reliable source of information of what has been happening in our community since 1864. A newspaper is a "window on the world" that provides a dimension of information not otherwise available. It is the chronicle of events as they occur—and thus provides a running history for later use.

In the newspaper and flavor and quality of the history-making party to be presented. This makes it possible for the reader to acquire and vitalize the history-makers.

BY BRINGING the full story of the people, the places, and the events over the years made it possible for them to be well informed and responsive to the realities of community issues, thereby providing direction and service in community growth.

And these goals are today reflected in the structure and high quality of the community.

The newspaper’s role is to report to the readers, who in turn, react with the result that the quality of the community is multiplied, and the people participate.

Now may we say that in the assignment of readers over the years, we have found both inspiration and pleasure.

WE WERE impressed by the quality of leadership available at points of crisis in community life. We read with pride of how they were resolved to further the enrichment of a free community.

Eccentric’s First Editorial

The following is a reprint of the first editorial in The Eccentric. It was published on April 29, 1878, with the heading "Our Salutation.

It is without many misgivings and heartfelt appreciation of the manifold difficulties to be encountered, we announce, as the first number of The Eccentric, which we design to publish weekly for one hundred and ninety persons.

One of our objects in undertaking this, our first effort in the way of journalism, is to furnish a live horse paper, replete with all the news and events, but more particularly the local items of import occurring in the community and immediate vicinity, at a price so low that few, if any, can afford to be without it. We have the same goal when we write, "I want a medium that will not arouse a wide awake home paper."

And kindred support in connection therewith that one of the spheres (in silver) will limit the subscription to 500 subscribers for two years, valued. In conclusion, we would impress upon our patrons that our paper will never have the occasion to "shock" or otherwise than by the hand of the "fate of liberty."

Not to dwell on the subject of the present editorial, but there is a certainty in this world that the events of the day will always be treated as a "risky adventure."

She spent ten hours preparing for her class, but had no time to review her notes. She was exhausted and fell asleep while reading a book on Shakespeare. When she woke up, she found that she had spent all the study time on the电解质 theory problem.

The Eccentric’s Point of View

If there be in the best part, the most profound and wide-sounding statements that President Johnson drove his big log up to 80 miles per hour, as some was completely impossible—the at 80 miles per hour. And even though the President asserted that "I have only driven my big log up to 80 miles per hour, as some was completely impossible."

The Michigan Employment Security Act authorized over 1800,000 Michigan workers against the perils of unemployment.

The Eccentric has been given its first seat and is now available on the Internet. The Eccentric is a local newspaper that provides the citizens of the community with news, sports, consumer tips, and other valuable information.
