

Early B'ham Produced Its Own Vigilantes

Early Birmingham was not quite the "wild West" but it did have its share of crime. Horse thieves and other law-breakers were very prevalent in the area and often times, it was left to the victims to "round-up" the criminals. The following story, from the Oct. 4, 1878 paper, describes such an incident.

"Fred King of Bloomfield Center came home on Friday afternoon last and found the back door of his house stove in with a stick of timber and the house upset generally with five dollars gone and a lot of pennies.

"HE STARTED for the village to inform the authorities and found three men going down the railroad near J. G. Wilson's. Jim informed them that they were his prisoners and the largest of the trio said, "Not by a d—d night." Fred informed him that he was the man he wanted first and colared the two larger ones.

"He told the third one to follow, which he did so reluctantly, and James McBride, who chanced to be in the vicinity, grabbed him and the trio were brought before Squire Bodine, were searched and several coins, which Fred identified, were found on their persons. They were sent to the county jail."
