School Changes Faster Today Than in 1950's

Things are happening fast these days in the high schools and only a little more slowly in the elementary schools, according to John S. Blakshof, director of Michigan professor of higher education.
He points out that since Sputnik there has been a wave of criticism of the public schools. "It has ranged from irresponsible blanket condemnations by admirals, journalists, and academic battlers to the much more responsible attitudes of Conant and others," he says.
"As a result, committees of distinguished physicists, mathematicians, biologists, and chemists have been working with able secondary-school teachers to devise new college-preparatory programs.

"A COLLEAGUE in mathematics tells me that if a parent can help their children with their school at home, it is being taught wrong," Diekhoff says.
"In some schools, to be sure the 'new mathematics' is being taught by teachers who do not understand it, and the old mathematics is still taught in most schools.
"But the change is coming. There are new textbooks in physics, biology, and chemistry, and many colleges and universities—with the help of foundation grants—have sponsored summer institutes to help bring secondary-school teachers up to date in the rapidly changing worlds of the physical and biological sciences. Similar activities are under way in English, foreign languages, and social studies."

THE U-M educator says some high schools offer college courses and enriched programs, perhaps at some cost to other students. School are extending their curriculum in mathematics, sciences, and modern languages.
"As the high school comes closer to doing the job professors imagine for it, professors will be forced to imagine an appropriate new job for the college," says Diekhoff.
"Changes in one level of education require changes in others."
